Yesterday marked the launch of Wikileaks ' newest project, the Spyfiles, following an announcement from Julian Assange while speaking on a panel at the Bureau of Investigative Journalism at the City University of London. Addressing the audience, Assange casually dropped the bomb that a new batch of files uncover the " international mass-surveillance industry. " From the conference: In what sounds like the most dystopian novel I ' ve ever read, Wikileaks explained the extent of the surveillance operation: International surveillance companies are based in the more technologically sophisticated countries, and they sell their technology on to every country of the world. This industry is, in practice, unregulated. Intelligence agencies, military forces and police authorities are able to silently, and on mass, and secretly intercept calls and take over computers without the help or knowledge of the telecommunication providers. Users ' physical location can be tracked if they are carrying a mobile phone, even if it is only on stand by. But the WikiLeaks Spy Files are more than just about ' good Western countries ' exporting to ' bad developing world countries ' . Western companies are also selling a vast range of mass surveillance equipment to Western intelligence agencies. In traditional spy stories, intelligence agencies like MI5 bug the phone of one or two people of interest. In the last ten years systems for indiscriminate, mass surveillance have become the norm. Intelligence companies such as VASTech secretly sell equipment to permanently record the phone calls of entire nations. Others record the location of every mobile phone in a city, down to 50 meters. Systems to infect every Facebook user, or smart-phone owner of an entire population group are on the intelligence market. The Wikileaks release also explains that citizens involved in overthrowing their respective dictators during the Arab Spring this year discovered listening rooms " where devices from Gamma corporation of the UK, Amesys of France, VASTech of South Africa and ZTE Corp of China monitored their every move online and on the phone. " Further, the Spyfiles announcement details how surveillance entities in the U.S., Italy and France have manufactured viruses to infiltrate private computers and smart phones — they ' re looking at you, iPhone, Blackberry, and Gmail users — in order to essentially hijack the device and record its every movement. Wikileaks cohort have taken the Spyfiles release and created a remarkably fascinating — and outright terrifying — to help make sense of this new information to the visually-inclined. Go ahead and play around with it and become scared. Not included in the video above is of how intelligence surveillance isn ' t only limited to certain regions of the world: But software users in the West are not safe either. Assange and other members of the panel told reporters how Western intelligence services used electronic devices to monitor the activities of its citizens. In Britain MI5 apparently used specialized voice recognition software implanted into cell phones that could make out who was speaking to whom. Other intelligence agencies had the ability to figure out where exactly the user was located, what they were typing and what they looked like. One of the programs allowed agencies to take photos of unsuspecting victims by using cameras implanted into their phones. One intrepid tweeter already seems to have corroborated Wikipedia's claim: submarine This means MX has a " Nationwide Voice Identification and Database Management " or WTF? Scroll to 14:00-14:30 via & middot; powered by More mysterious is that Wikileaks seems to be experiencing some accessibility issues with their website right now following the release of the Spyfiles: WikiLeak is blocked following release. In a post on Yahoo's Yodel Anecdotal blog, the company says " We have retired more than 75,000 pieces of inactive and outdated content from Associated Content. None of this content will appear on Yahoo! Voices, and only content that meets our revised Submission Guidelines will be accepted moving forward. Older content that does not meet these standards will be gradually retired or returned to the original author for editing. " This is obviously a reaction (albeit a very late reaction) to Google's Panda update, which itself has been updated various times throughout the year, and will likely continue to be tweaked. I'm sure you know the story if you're reading this. If not, you can find our past coverage. Demand Media ended up, and seems to have been doing ok since (though they did implement a broader and put a greater emphasis on social). Here's an email that Yahoo has sent out to writers: We're writing to notify you about some important changes to Yahoo! Contributor Network and our digital library of content. First, allow us to introduce : a new online home for millions of pieces of content created by our community of experts and enthusiasts. Yahoo! Voices () replaces Associated Content as the official digital library of Yahoo! Contributor Network. Most content formerly published on Associated Content will now be found on the new site, and URLs will automatically redirect to the corresponding pieces on . You'll now see Yahoo! Voices in place of Associated Content on your profile page, Account page, and Content menu as well. We're also pleased to announce these important changes in connection with the launch of Yahoo! Voices: New Submission Guidelines: Today we are releasing revised , which better clarify what we're seeking: unique content containing authentic perspectives from experts, enthusiasts, and citizen journalists, to complement Yahoo!'s broader editorial offerings. Read the new guidelines . Editing and retiring content: The above guidelines apply to new and existing content. Any published content that does not meet these standards may be returned for editing or retired. We ask that you review your own library to identify content that doesn't meet our new guidelines, is outdated, or simply isn't something you're proud to call your best work. We've added two new options to our content flag tool. " Flagging my own content for retirement " will, pending editors' review, remove that content from the site (without affecting your accumulated page views, pending Performance Bonus, or Clout score). " Flagging my own content for edits " will prompt us to return the content to you so that you can update and resubmit it. " Yahoo!
